The radiation induced xerostomia constitutes a major clinical problem which often interferes with the patients' quality of life. The replacement of lost gland secretions is a frequent cause for dental caries, infection, and tooth loss. Depending on the localization of the gland defect, different treatment options are available. The increasing demand for dental implants after cancer therapy demands new treatment options. For this purpose, silicone tubes were designed which were inserted into a newly developed special oral soft-tissue protecting implant (ON). The patients were treated with two different types of silicone tubes: ON-T and ON-G. Eight patients with prior treatment in the head- and neck area received the silicone tubes ON-T (two women, six men; mean age 41.2 years). In another patient population, 10 patients with the same tumor stage and with radiation induced salivary fistulas received ON-G (nine women, one man; mean age 38.5 years). Follow-up periods of the two patient groups ranged from one to 14 months. During this study period, no implant failures occurred and it could be shown that an increased salivation could be detected immediately after installing the silicone tubes. No infections could be detected on the silicone tubes. Our findings suggest that the silicone tube ON-G is a safe, patient-specific, and promising treatment option.Q: How to use a table in the where clause of a stored procedure I have the following select statement which give me the row number count of 2 tables: select row_number() over (order by tbl1.val) row_count, tbl2.val, tbl1.val from dbo.tbl1, dbo.tbl2 where tbl1.val =
